Conventional approaches to prevention involve chemical, biological, or passive immunization strategies. Because they are based on antibiotics, they are only partially effective and their long term use is limited. Conventional therapy, which includes therapy with penicillin, is compromised by increasing resistance in the most common meningococcal serogroups (B and C). A live conjugate vaccine is available for serogroup C but this serogroup is responsible for a significant percentage of cases of disease (30%) and is also associated with significant mortality (5-15%). The N. meningitidis outer membrane proteins (OMPs) are the major antigens in the polysaccharide capsule and in the conjugate vaccine. The genetic and antigenic variability of the OMPs in N. meningitidis is an obstacle to their use as antigen for an effective vaccine. An alternative strategy is to develop and evaluate mutants defective in OMPs and allow them to function as a live vaccine by delivering antigens in the context of the normal architecture of the meningococcus. We have constructed, characterized, and selected mutant meningococci which lack the OMPs PorA, OpcA, OpcB, PorB, OpaB, and OpdA. These mutant strains will be evaluated for their ability to elicit bacter f988f36e3a
